Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: . of the superintendents and teachers have seen and appreciated the helpfulness of drawing in connection with the other studies, and good results have been secured in spite of these difficulties. The almost universal request is for a definite and detailed outline of what should be done. Perhaps the best answer to this would be a course in drawing, planned to cover the work of six years in two divisions, the first taking up primary drawing in three years, and the second drawing for grammar grades in three years, thus requiring but two classes in each school, the course to be arranged in lessons given in detail and illustrated, so that definite steps for each month s work could be given to every teacher. I may add that such a course is now in preparation, and we confidently hope it may be placed in the hands of the country teachers before the opening of the spring term. Another cause which has already produced an effect in the smaller towns is the recent rule of the Board requiring drawing in the entrance examinations for the normal schools. For example, Nantucket, which stood at the foot of the list of counties last year, because of the rule, now stands next the head, having not only introduced drawing as a required study, but also having employed a special instructor. The smaller towns in some cases are uniting to secure competent supervision in drawing. The following list shows the cities...
